Gender statistics

- Gender statistics is a part of each traditional area of statistics and serves for identifying, producing and disseminating statistics reflecting real lives of women and men and feeds into gender policy making.
- Gender statistics not only collects data disaggregated by sex but by identifying relations between men and women it addresses the issues of data availability and use.
- Neither women nor men are homogeneous groups: because of economic, geographic, social or cultural differences some people of both sexes can be more disadvantaged than others.
- Thus, for a true picture further disaggregation is required: by age, location, education, employment status, ethnicity, etc.
Main sources of data:

- Statistical reporting forms which include gender-sensitive indicators, especially in agriculture statistics, population statistics, social statistics, employment, etc.
- Population and Housing Censuses (latest population census was held in 2010), agricultural census (2013)
- Household budget surveys (quarterly surveys of 3,000 households).
In addition, various surveys were held in 1999-2012 which are used as data sources including:

- Demography and Health Survey (DHS) – 2012
- Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey (MICS) - 2000, 2005
- Maternal and child mortality survey – 2010
- Living standards measurement survey (latest in 2009)
Dissemination of gender statistics

- Gender-related statistics are published in statistical publications ‘Women and Men in Tajikistan’, ‘Gender Indicators of Peasant Farms’
