The goal of this event is to learn and exchange on how cities are integrating the health dimension in transport policy. The event will look at how cities, such as London and Berlin, are addressing public health issues in their transport policies by promoting active travel via the Transport Action Plan in London or by actively making active travel safer in Berlin.

The event will enable a discussion on what is done by city organizations such as Polis and the WHO Healthy Cities network, with the example of France for the latter, to support their members on this topic.

Participants will be invited to comment on recommendations which can be made at the national and international level to progress in supporting the health benefits of active travel.
